Giving Evidence

A recent article, “Good Charities Spend More on Administrative Costs Than Less Good Charities Spend,” posted by Giving Evidence “shows (doesn't just argue) that high-performing charities spend more on administration costs than weaker ones do.”¹

According to the article, the top charities of 2009 had higher administration costs than lower rated charities. This trend repeated in 2011. Data was drawn from GiveWell, a US non-profit dedicated to the review and recommendation of charities. Ratings were based in part on the charity's impact, cost-effectiveness and need for additional funding.

The article argues that arbitrary lowering of administration costs can result in “weaker charities,” which is not good for the donor, organization or beneficiary.
